→ Dear Diary
24 January 2026

Today, I felt a mixture of happiness and sadness. My dear grandchild came to visit me with their father. It was such a joy to see that young face full of energy and curiosity. We spent the entire day talking, laughing, and sharing stories. For a few hours, my small house felt alive again.

When my son entered the house, my heart became full. I had been waiting for him for so long. I always hope that one day he will return to the village and stay with me. As a mother, I do not need riches or comfort; I only need the presence of my children and grandchildren near me. Their voices are sweeter than any music.

But as evening approached, I felt a quiet fear inside me. I knew they would soon leave for the city. The city has given my son work and a better life, but it has taken him away from me. I understand his responsibilities, yet my old heart longs for his company. Growing old alone is not easy.

After they left, the house became silent again. The walls that once echoed with laughter now stand still. I slowly walked to my room and sat near the window, remembering the happy moments of today. I looked at the empty courtyard and wished I could hear my grandchild's footsteps once more.

I pray that one day my son will understand that an old mother needs love more than anything else. I do not blame him, but I hope he will think about spending more time with me. Until then, I will wait patiently, holding onto the memories of today's visit and hoping for another tomorrow filled with love.
